By February 12, 2020, more than 100,000 patients with 2019-nCoV infections have been reported, most of whom were from the epicenter of the outbreak in

Wuhan, China.[@bib1] In this unique situation, researchers in the primary outbreak area of Wuhan have taken the initiative to study the virology, epidemiology, diagnosis, treatment, and prevention of 2019-nCoV. The study of 2019-nCoV revealed 3 viral subtypes: A, B, and C.[@bib1] ^,^ [@bib2] On December 31, 2019, researchers in Wuhan first found the novel coronavirus using real-time quantitative reverse transcription-polymerase chain reaction (rRT-PCR), as recommended by the World Health Organization (WHO).[@bib1] A second rRT-PCR assay revealed a novel coronavirus.[@bib2] The virus was then isolated, and the full-length genome was determined to be 2019-nCoV.[@bib1] ^,^ [@bib2] However, rRT-PCR has many shortcomings and is not considered a sensitive method for the early detection of 2019-nCoV.[@bib1] ^,^ [@bib2] The sensitivity of rRT-PCR is at least 100-fold lower than that of nucleic acid detection techniques.[@bib1] During the current study, an antibody test was developed that detects the expression of 2019-nCoV nucleocapsid protein in human blood and its ability to distinguish between positive and negative 2019-nCoV samples. Based on the nucleocapsid protein detection of 2019-nCoV, a series of anti-nucleocapsid protein monoclonal antibodies (mAbs) were developed by immunizing 82157476af
