Category: Windows programs, when the first logic stage 310 produces the next logic value, the previous logic value is still present in the latch or flip-flop of the first stage, and is applied as the logic value on the clock signal path. This is possible since the clock signal line is in a static state at this point and can thus pass the logic value already present in the latch or flip-flop of the first stage. This can only happen if the clock signal is at a logic low state. Thus, the result of the first stage will be carried over to the second stage and will cause a logic high state on the path containing the phase advance circuit for the second stage. The previous logic value will be thus outputted in the second stage after a delay of one clock cycle. This is a similar problem as the one encountered with the flip-flop (FF) of the first stage 310. The input signal passes the logic value of the latch or flip-flop of the first stage. The clock signal is in a static state and thus passes the logic value of the latch or flip-flop of the first stage. The previous logic value is then latched by the second stage, since it is present on the clock signal path. This can only happen if the clock signal is at a logic low state. The result of the first stage is then outputted to the second stage after a delay of one clock cycle. Thus, the result of the first stage is latched in the second stage and then outputted to the third stage after a delay of two clock cycles. Since the third stage is fed back to the second stage, it will be
